LAW IN ENGLAND AND AMERICA

London Writer Says Profession is Better on This Side.

I have seen something of legal practice on both sides of the Atlantic, and my opinion is that our profession would gain immensely by combining the two branches pretty much as they are combined in the United States and Canada, says a writer in the London Saturday Review. It is obvious that the solicitors would profit by such an agreement. They would have the right of audience in all courts, and the opportunity to qualify themselves for promotion to the bench.

In America the young lawyer goes to an office, where he makes his merit known by steady attention to business. There will always be two kinds of lawyers—those who stay in their offices, dealing directly with clients and attending to matters of routine, and those who advise on points of law and argue cases in court. These two orders of men are clearly distinguished in America, but they work together as partners to the great advantage of the client.

STATESMAN ENJOYED THE FAIR

Simple Recreation indulged in by the Late W. E. Gladstone.

In a recently published life of Lord Granville appears this of Mr. Gladstone. He "came over with Mrs. Gladstone and Lord and Lady Sydney, whose guest he was at Deal, because you could not guess it in a thousand—because there was to be a fair that afternoon and Mr. Gladstone wanted to try a merry-go-round. Indeed, we all went after luncheon, and it was only on arriving him that the opposition papers would make fun of it next morning that Mr. Gladstone renounced a 'surree' on the merry-go-round, and he did his best to console himself by strolling into every booth, from the giant woman to the calf with eight legs, every possible monotony was honored by the premier's visit, who seemed to enjoy himself more than the schoolboys to whom their dons showed the G. O. M."
